The battle of gettysburg began early on the morning of july 1, 1863, when general john buford's lookouts spotted the confederate column sent by general a.p. hill three miles west of gettysburg. A union cavalry officer fired the first shot of the battle, and the confederates answered back with gunshots of their own. The cavalrymen knew they could not stop the southern infantry, so they slowly fell back toward gettysburg until they reached the mcpherson farm. The cavalry was making one last, determined stand when union infantry arrived just in time to throw back the confederates. One of the first union soldiers to fall was major general john fulton reynolds, who was killed instantly while leading his troops into the fight.
