In 1334, Ibn Battuta crossed the mountains of afghanistan into northern india. He presented himself at the sultan's court in delhi.

Fearing the anger of the sultan for his failure, Ibn Battuta stayed for nearly two years in the maldiv islands. Later he went to the island of sumatra, in what is now the nation of indonesia.

After less than a year, Ibn Battuta was ready to move on—this time back home to morocco. In 1348, he traveled through syria, which was suffering from a terrible plague, or deadly disease. In the city of damascus, around two thousand people were dying from the disease every day.
